

Protecting the workforce from insider threats takes more than reporting bad apples. Each of us should be accountable for our behavior and for the environment we create together. Sometimes when problems arise, we should pause and ask, “Maybe it’s me?”

Some concerning behaviors in the workplace may be common but that does not mean they should continue. Here are three behaviors that we should be mindful of and try to avoid in order to promote a healthy, safe, and productive workforce.

Maybe I’m Gossiping?

You may think sharing details about a coworker’s personal issues is helpful, but sometimes that should be your coworker’s decision to make.

On average, American workers spend about 40 minutes a week gossiping. That’s 33 hours a year!

Employees who discover they are targets of gossip feel socially excluded, and less inclined to communicate and collaborate.

Gossiping is different than reporting concerning behavior. Before you share, ask yourself if you are trying to keep everyone safe and productive.

Maybe I’m Excluding My Coworkers?

You may think leaving an opinionated colleague off of a meeting invitation will save time, but different points of view add value and perspective.

Excluding an individual or group in the workplace leads to hurt feelings, anxiety, depression, disengagement, and job dissatisfaction. Affected employees will start to think about leaving.

Set a meeting agenda ahead of time and discuss ground rules to help keep meetings on track.

Maybe I’m Blaming?

You may think blaming people publicly increases accountability, but it contributes to a toxic culture.

1 in 5 U.S. workers have searched for a new job due to the culture in their workplace.

A culture of blame and shame leads to feelings of paranoia and defensiveness.

Let managers deal with performance issues in private. The team should focus on opportunities for improvement and lessons learned.

Problematic behaviors lead to toxic environments, which in turn lead to more problematic behaviors. Will you help break the cycle?

Protecting the workforce from insider threats takes more than reporting bad apples. Each of us should be accountable for our behavior and for the environment we create together. Sometimes when problems arise, we should pause and ask, “Maybe it’s me?”

Some concerning behaviors in the remote workplace may be common but that does not mean they should continue. Here are three behaviors that we should be mindful of and try to avoid in order to promote a healthy, safe, and productive workforce.

Maybe I’m Embarrassing a Coworker?

You may think it’s okay to address a problem in a virtual group meeting, but your coworker may feel uncomfortable responding in a public setting.

In a 2021 study, 35% of people reported experiencing or witnessing mistreatment during public virtual meetings.

Maybe I’m Cyber Gossiping?

You may think gossiping in private side chats is harmless, but ask yourself if you would be comfortable if everyone could see what you’ve typed.

Remote employees disengage and stop building relationships with their colleagues if they sense that their work culture tolerates gossip.

Keep your focus on the meeting and engage in conversations that are professional.

Maybe I’m Isolating Others?

You may think limiting the guest list for your virtual happy hour builds closer bonds, but the negative emotional impact for those you leave out can be significant.

In a 2021 survey of remote workers, 16% reported loneliness as their biggest work-related struggle.

Employees who are left out identify less with their organizations and are more likely to leave.

When you or others work remotely, make sure to include everyone to build and maintain relationships.

Problematic behaviors lead to toxic environments, which in turn lead to more problematic behaviors. Will you help break the cycle?