I. Introduction

This project is an attempt to apply a systematic model of marine policy making to certain aspects of marine policy of particular concern to the United States Navy, i.e., the regulation of marine scientific research (MSR) and the control of navigation especially within 200-mile economic zones. The actual model employed has been developed over several years and consists of some 90 variables collected for most of the world's nations. Figure I-1 illustrates the model of marine policy making.

The model employed here involved a mass of information (approximately 13,000 pieces of data). Thus, it was desirable to try to find some efficient, parsimonious way of summarizing the data without sacrificing explanatory power. This has been accomplished with factor analysis which yielded eight factors that explain most of the variance in the original variables. These eight factors have been given the following descriptive titles:

1. Global Size/Wealth
2. Prosperity/International Cooperation
3. Relative Coastal Importance
4. Oil Resources
5. Fishing Importance/Navy
6. Geneva Convention Acceptance
7. Merchant Shipping/Marine Scientific Research Importance
8. Absolute Marine Importance

Each country in the model has been assigned a factor score corresponding to the magnitude of its involvement with the factor. These factor scores can be treated like variables and related to those attributes that are the focus of this project, specifically, MSR and navigation.

An important part of this project is Appendix A which contains country profiles of each state. Included in these profiles are factor scores on each of the eight factors as well as information relating more directly to the attributes being assessed for this project, i.e., navigation rights in EEZ's and marine science research in EEZ's. In order to assess the impact of the general political climate existing in the late 1970's, three variables derived from UN voting behavior have been included in the profiles. It is hoped that these purely political variables may supplement the explanatory power of the rest of the model which relies rather heavily on "hard," objective data.

II. Nature of Dependent Variables

One of the main operational difficulties with this project is finding accurate indices for the dependent variables, i.e., control over navigation and marine scientific research within EEZ's. In some ways, accurate information about such matters will not be available for many years. If the UN Law of the Sea Conference produces a treaty, it will provide the basis for an international solution to the matter with most control over MSR and navigation coming under the aegis of the treaty. On the other hand, if unilateral claims are the main vehicle for asserting control, then a different approach to the problem will be needed.

The first two columns in Table II-1 are derived from work done by Dr. Robert L. Friedheim of the University of Southern California. The numbers are an ordinal scale representing the average position taken by states in the debates at the UN Law of the Sea Conference. The first column "M.S.R. Rights in Economic Zones" ranges from 3.0 to 14.0--lower numbers indicate more rights for researching states to operate in foreign economic zones. It is felt that these numbers give a fairly accurate indication of countries' positions on the issue, a position that will be reflected either by the interpretive posture toward a new LOS treaty or by the nature of unilateral claims. The second column is a similar scale representing state positions on restricting navigation in economic zones; lower numbers indicate fewer restrictions on navigation within EEZ's.

Since this project focuses on controls placed within economic zones, another variable indicating extent of economic claim has been included in the table. Many countries have no economic zone claim--this may be due to (1) a 200-mile territorial sea claim, (2) landlocked status, or

(3) no assertion of a claim. Obviously, the information generated here will have greatest impact on those countries with large EEZ claims. However, one must remember that the law of the sea for the last quarter of the 20th century has seen the traditional, sharp distinctions between territorial sea, fisheries zone, and extensive economic zone blurred considerably.

The last variable in the table gives the number of multilateral treaties signed since World War II. Additionally, the percentage of reservations to these treaties is indicated. These two pieces of information should give some indication of states' tendencies to follow through with the multilateral treaty making process. Attendance at UN-sponsored conferences is easy--but many states are unwilling to follow through with signature and ratification of the resultant treaties.

In essence, this section has presented the basic information. The task of the next section will be interpretation. This can take two forms, analyzing this information and relating it to certain other kinds of data contained in the model.

III. Explanation of the Dependent Variables

One of the raisons d'être of this project was to relate the MSR and navigation variables to the other elements of the marine policy model. This can be done in a number of ways, the most simple of which is computing simple correlations between the dependent variables and components of the model. The results of such a comparison can be seen in Figure III-1.

The results conveyed in Figure III-1 are at once disappointing and intriguing. Models like this attempt to explain dependent variable(s) by using a set of independent variables. The goal of such exercises is to account for much of the pattern or variance in the dependent variables. By this criterion, the model is not very successful. Only 8% of the variance of the MSR Rights variable is explained by all the independent acting in concert. Similarly, only 12% of the variance in the Navigation Rights variable is explained.

Thus, at least when this approach is taken, it must be acknowledged that the results are minimal. Nevertheless, some of the interrelationships are interesting. First, note that there is almost no relationship between MSR Rights and Navigation Rights--this means there is no tendency for states lenient on one type of activity to be lenient on the other; conventional wisdom would seem to suggest that this is the case. Correlations with the other variables in the model are very low. The two that are greater than |.20| deserve closer examination. MSR Rights correlates -.23 with the first of three factors describing recent voting in the UN General Assembly. This UN Voting factor clearly identifies a North/South split with developed countries having the higher factor scores. This means that

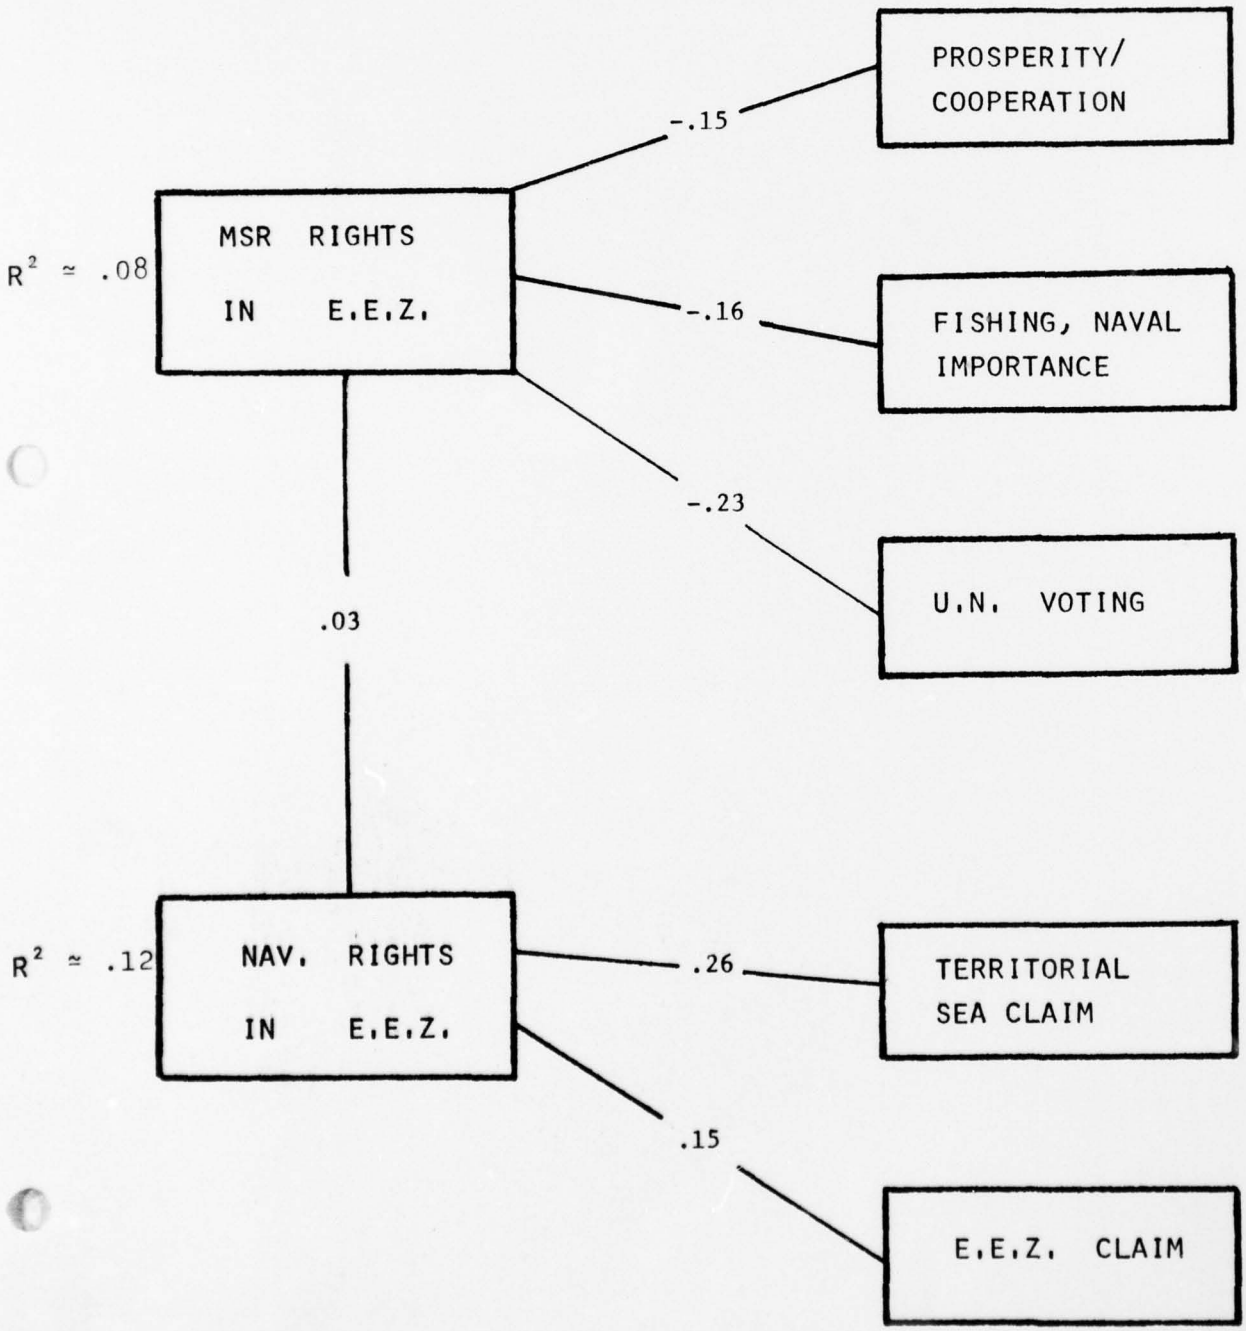
RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN DEPENDENT VARIABLES
AND ELEMENTS OF THE MODEL



LDC's tend to favor fewer marine science rights within economic zones, hardly an earth-shaking conclusion!

The strongest relationship in the model is between Navigation Rights and territorial sea claim. This means that those countries with wide territorial sea claims tend to favor fewer navigational rights within EEZ's. Again, this might have been expected. One would infer that because these countries favor more restrictions, they have chosen to claim wide territorial seas, rather than some narrower assertion of sovereignty.

But, on balance, it must be conceded that the model of marine policy making does not do a very good job of explaining the two dependent variables. This is disturbing. Bear in mind that the model was very carefully constructed to accommodate most important objective aspects of states' relationships to the marine environment. The unavoidable conclusion is that most states in their decisions to take policy positions on actions within their 200-mile EEZ are not guided by objective, economically rational criteria. Put another way, there is little relationship between the tangible benefits a state is likely to get from a 200-mile EEZ and the types of regulations states will impose within their EEZ's. To some degree, this result might have been anticipated--it has long been recognized that the 200-mile width of economic zones had little practical or economic significance. But also disturbing is the fact that the UN Voting factors, specifically introduced as indices of the general political climate in the world, also do not explain very much of the variance in the dependent variables. Thus, it would seem that these variables are not easily explained by the objective economic and geographic situation of states or by the general political climate.

There is one other analytic strategy open, i.e., looking at actual country scores on the dependent variables to draw some reasonable inferences about these countries. This is what has been done in Tables III-1, III-2, III-3, III-4, and III-5.

Tables III-4 and III-5 attempt to predict the mode for implementing zonal restriction by looking at treaty behavior. The treaty index used is the percentage of reservations to multilateral treaties concluded. This was found to be a more accurate indication of multilateral/unilateral leanings for both developing and developed states. Two things are abundantly clear from the tables. First is the fact that according to this type of categorization, one finds more unilateral tendencies than multilateral ones. This portends even more problems for navigation and MSR within economic zones. Second, the indication is that navigation rights are affected less by the unilateral/multilateral dimension than is MSR. Table III-4 paints a gloomy picture for MSR--most states favor at least moderate restrictions and the largest portion of these are more prone to act through unilateral means.

IV. Conclusions

This project has attempted to apply a concrete model of marine policy making to regulations that are placed on navigation and MSR within 200-mile EEZ. Some of the results have been disappointing in that the model, comprehensive as it is, does not account for much of the variance in the dependent variables. Some of this problem may have come from the thinness of the data. Originally, it was hoped to look for trends in MSR and navigation regulation, but data simply are not yet available. It has often been presumed that actions states take within 200-mile zones will fall within the general bounds of "Western rationality." This research demonstrates conclusively that such is not the case. Furthermore, such actions do not even follow the general political climate as measured by voting in the UN General Assembly.

An important question is where does this research lead. There can be no doubt that the subject of controls within EEZs is and will continue to be vitally important to the U.S. Navy. In the last couple years, the probabilities have shifted considerably against the chances of a successful UN Law of the Sea Conference producing a widely-accepted treaty. The number of unilateral claims to 200-mile zones has been increasing. Some feel that the U.S. claim of a 200-mile fishing zone has inspired many other claims, most of which will be more comprehensive and less tied to standards of economic rationality. If this occurs, it will have some advantages and some disadvantages. On the positive side, if countries state clearly by way of domestic legislation what their policies will be, it will remove some of the ambiguity. Although, there is often considerable flexibility in the way statutes are enforced. On the negative side, unilateral claims will tend to allow fewer rights of MSR and navigation in addition to being much more cumbersome. Even if the regulations adopted are generally reasonable, the mere fact that there are perhaps one hundred different sets of regulations will make things very difficult for MSR and navigation.

It is hoped that this project has shed some light on a complex and important subject. Perhaps now with the proliferation of 200-mile claims, it is possible to do a better job of predicting the amount of control over navigation and MSR within these zones. In the next few years it will be possible to inventory the exact nature of the 200-mile claims and the modes of implementation used for these claims when these two kinds of information are available, along with some index of the importance of the regions being claimed. Then, real progress may indeed be possible.
