ABSTRACT (Continue on reverse side if necessary and identify by block number) A detailed analysis was conducted of armor operations to provide the basis for developing a set of platoon drills for combined individual and collective armor training. The analysis provided information on the stages of armor operations, the individual and collective tasks that are performed during each stage, training objectives for these tasks, leadership tasks that are performed during each stage, and the types of factors that affect armor operations during combat.

INTRODUCTION

The requirement to attain and sustain higher levels of combat readiness has increased the difficulties involved in the management of armor training. The difficulties stem from the additional training needed to reach and maintain these higher levels of readiness. The recent emphasis upon collective training has created still further difficulties since collective training exercises must be incorporated into training schedules that are already overcrowded.

A potential solution to this problem is to combine individual and collective training. This can be accomplished by providing opportunities to practice individual skills during collective training exercises. The combination of individual and collective training could be further improved by assessing both individual and collective performance during the training exercises, and by correcting performance deficiencies either during or after the exercises.

Platoon drills provide a potentially suitable context for combining individual and collective training. A platoon drill is a platoon level training exercise in which the different elements of a platoon practice coordination. The goal of a platoon drill is to enable these elements to react quickly and automatically with a minimum of communications from the platoon leader. Since ultimately the drill must facilitate platoon performance during combat, it is essential that the activities performed during a platoon drill correspond to those performed in combat. This correspondence can be assured by first identifying both the stages of combat operations and the individual and collective tasks performed during each stage. Platoon drills can then be developed that will correspond to different stages of combat, and training can be provided for both the individual and collective tasks that occur during these stages.

While performance deficiencies can be detected during a platoon drill by observing the outcomes or products of task performance, additional information is required to determine the cause of the deficiencies. To determine the cause of a deficiency in the performance of an individual task, it is necessary to compare the steps that were actually followed during the performance of the task with the steps that should have been followed. To determine the cause of a deficiency in the performance of a collective task, it is necessary to compare the actual performance of each contributor to the collective task with the performance that each contributor should have exhibited.

Purpose

There are two purposes for the research described in this volume. The first purpose is to identify the collective tasks performed during the different stages of combat. This information, when combined with similar information on individual tasks, could then serve as the basis for developing a series of platoon drills suitable for use in combined individual and collective training. The results of research conducted to identify the individual tasks performed during the different stages of combat are contained in Volume IV of this report.

The second purpose is to determine the components of collective tasks so that diagnoses of performance deficiencies can be made during the platoon drills. In particular, it was the purpose of this research to determine the crew and individual tasks that are performed during each platoon task, and to determine the individual tasks that are performed during each crew task.

PROCEDURE

The procedure that was followed to accomplish these purposes was to first identify the stages of armor operations and to select the operational stage that would serve as the basis for the platoon drills. Next, the platoon and crew tasks normally performed during each stage were identified. Finally, the platoon and crew tasks were examined, and the underlying tasks comprising each of these collective tasks were determined.

STAGES OF ARMOR OPERATIONS

The identification of the stages of armor operations was accomplished during an analysis of armor operations. The analysis is described in Volume I of this report, and diagrams and flow charts summarizing the analysis are contained in Volume II.

Missions and Mission Phases

The analysis of armor operations was conducted to identify, classify and interrelate the activities performed during tank platoon missions. A mission was defined as a specific goal that was assigned to a military unit by the commander of the unit at the next higher echelon. Since the number of such goals was assumed to be inherently large, it was concluded that the number of platoon missions was too extensive to serve as the focal point of the analysis. The first step in the analysis, therefore, was to identify the categories or clusters of activities that normally occur during the performance of these missions. Six such categories were identified--offense, defense, assembly areas, plan operations, conduct movement, and sustaining operations. These categories were labeled "mission phases" since the clusters occur at different times and represent different stages of mission performance. The four mission phases pertaining to activities conducted in support of offense and defense (i.e., assembly areas, plan operations, conduct movement, and sustaining operations) were collectively referred to as the "supporting mission phases".

Team Operations and Team Operation Phases

The analysis of armor operations focused on a tank team containing armor and infantry platoons. Since missions are assigned to platoons by the team commander to facilitate the performance of the team mission, it was concluded that the analysis of platoon operations must begin with an analysis of team operations. The strategy was to first identify the team operations that are normally performed during each mission phase. Once these were identified, the next step was to identify the platoon operations normally occurring during each team operation.

Tank team operations were identified during an examination of FM 71-1, The Tank Mechanized Infantry Company Team, June 1977. The description of the conduct of each operation was then examined to identify its phases. A team operation phase represents a cluster of activities that occur during different stages of a team operation. While some activities may occur during two or more phases of a team operation, the combination of activities performed during each phase tend to be unique and are intended to accomplish different subgoals.

Upon identifying the team operations and their phases, an analysis was conducted of the activities that occur during each operation. The focal point of this analysis was the team commander. From the descriptions of team operations, the command, control, and communications functions of the team commander were identified and placed into the sequence in which they would normally occur. The types of stimuli initiating each leadership act were derived from consideration of the combat situation. Team tasks were then identified by determining the specific team activities that would result from each command issued by the commander.

Platoon Operations

After the team operations and their phases were identified, the analysis was continued by examining the activities that occur at the platoon level. Descriptions of team operations were reviewed to identify the platoon operations that are conducted during each team operation phase. A platoon operation was defined as a coordinated set of activities that could be performed by a single tank platoon that would enable the platoon to accomplish the goal assigned to it by the team commander.

IDENTIFICATION OF COLLECTIVE TASKS PERFORMED DURING EACH PLATOON OPERATION

Based on an analysis of armor operations, the decision was made that the platoon operation was the most suitable stage of combat for the preparation of platoon drills. The next step, therefore, was to identify the collective tasks performed during each platoon operation.

Identification of Platoon Tasks

The platoon tasks performed during each platoon operation were identified during the analyses of platoon operations. The focal point of the analysis was the platoon leader. From the descriptions of armor operations contained in FM 71-1, The Tank Mechanized Infantry Company Team, June 1977, the command, control, and communications functions of the platoon leader were identified and placed into the sequence in which they would normally occur. Platoon tasks were identified by determining the specific platoon activities that would result from each command issued by the platoon leader. Lists of platoon tasks normally performed during each platoon operation are presented in Appendix A by mission phase, team operation, and team operation phase. An alphabetical list of these tasks is contained in Volume I of this report.

Identification of Crew Tasks

A crew task was defined as any task performed by two or more members of the same tank crew that required simultaneous or sequential coordinations between the crewmen. The tasks were identified by examining descriptions of armor activities and determining which activities could be performed only by the coordinated efforts of two or more members of the same tank crew. To determine which crew tasks would normally be performed during each platoon operation, judgments were made based on descriptions of armor operations in FM 71-1. Lists of crew tasks normally performed during each platoon operation are presented in Appendix B by mission phase, team operation, and team operation phase. An alphabetical list of these tasks is contained in Volume I of this report.

IDENTIFICATION OF THE COMPONENTS OF COLLECTIVE TASKS

Since there were no existing descriptions of platoon or crew tasks, the identification of the components of these tasks were based on judgments. The crew tasks, tank commander tasks, gunner tasks, driver tasks, and loader tasks performed during each platoon task are contained in Appendix C. The tank commander tasks, gunner tasks, driver tasks, and loader tasks performed during each crew task are contained in Appendix D.
