Breakdown of Election Results

[Article by 'Urubah Barakat]

[Text] Kuwait—The Kuwaiti voters have had their say in the National Assembly elections, and interest has now shifted from following the names of candidates and winners to calculating the balance among the various trends and blocs whose representation in the Assembly has been decided by the voters.

But political observers are now poring over certain facts that were confirmed by the elections, the foremost being that no one single bloc can impose its presence or overwhelm the others. This would enable engaging in a balanced and sensible parliamentary process that calls on all of the different blocs to agree on common denominators.

None among the major blocs—with the exception of the "Deputies' Bloc" (1985 deputies), whose most prominent figure is Ahmad al-Sa'dun—is represented by more than three deputies [as published]. Although there is a large number of opposition deputies among the independents, it is said that the government is willing to let some of the opposition parties be represented through appointments to cabinet posts. Certain sources say that among the persons likely to enter the government from among the opposition bloc are Dr. Nasir al-Sani', Mishari al-'Anjari, and 'Abd-al-Muhsin Jamal.

The opposition circles are certain that Ahmad al-Sa'dun is the candidate most likely to win the position of National Assembly speaker and that there is an implicit agreement on this matter. Meanwhile, observers believe that the cohesion of the opposition, which the circles believe numbers between 27 to 31 deputies, depends a great deal on how the government handles certain outstanding political and social issues. Although opposition leaders say that they always coordinate their stands and that they agree on all issues, with the exception of the application of Islamic laws and women's right to vote—which is rejected by the Salafi trend—it is expected, in light of the general climate in the country following the occupation and liberation experience, that the desire for maintaining balance and stability will prevail in the general political atmosphere.

The Kuwaiti National Assembly election results have underlined many facts that have been obscured for a long time—that is, since the former National Assembly was disbanded in 1986, the former National Council [al-majlis al-watani] was formed, Kuwait was occupied and then liberated, and until yesterday morning, when the counting of votes in most of the constituencies was completed.

The most important fact is the great rise in the level of political awareness among the Kuwaiti citizens. The outcome of the elections produced major surprises for everybody, contrary to the government's claim that there were no surprises in the results.

One of the most admirable changes is that all the political forces and trends have substantially and effectively been represented in the National Assembly and that all the strong opposition leaders have won. This goes to prove another thing—that the 1992 Assembly has the potential to be the most powerful National Assembly in Kuwait's history. Observers believe that the National Assembly has expressed the people's rejection of the many practices that existed before the hateful Iraqi invasion. The Assembly aims at carrying out a radical change in the policies that affect Kuwait's political, economic, and social security.

Observers believe that all of the opposition trends, from the extreme right to the extreme left, having won in the elections means that the Kuwaiti people are confident that all of their political trends are nationalist in the full sense of the word. Therefore, they deserve to be given an opportunity to prove their ability and cohesiveness for the sake of achieving the basic objectives that they agreed on in the statements of the "Alliance of the Opposition Forces" in Kuwait, which were issued before and during the elections. They did so at the political gatherings the candidates held sometimes individually and other times collectively.

The publicity that accompanied the election campaign of candidates who offered favors to the voters had no bearing on the decision of the electors, who voted for candidates interested in major issues, despite the tempting offers the other candidates made, beginning with buying votes and ending with offers to exert influence on their behalf. The outcome of the elections has revealed certain facts with respect to the electors' awareness of the secrets of the election game and their skill at playing it. When the election campaign was officially launched, all of the alliance candidates announced that there would be no alliances among the opposition candidates, but there would be alliances among those belonging to the same trend. These were located in various electoral districts. But the election results have shown that strong, but secret, alliances were formed between candidates of different political trends. These alliances were not publicized in certain constituencies until election day in order to avoid conflict with the government candidates.

Uncovering the electoral cards was an election necessity aimed at stemming the rumors that have spread like fire. The strong candidates in the seven political groups and trends have forged an alliance among themselves regardless of their political and ideological affiliations in order to ensure winning the elections. This has actually happened in a number of constituencies in order to insure that the strong ones will enter the Assembly.

Some of the candidates of certain trends have skillfully played the election and candidacy game. Several persons from the same trend would stand as candidates in the same constituency, but they would concentrate on one particular candidate in order to ensure his success.

All of these facts confirm that the Kuwaiti people have emerged from the trauma of the war stronger than before and learned lessons they will never forget.

Positions of Political Groups Described

93AE0053A London AL-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic
2 Oct 92 p 3

[Text] After the liberation, the opposition was disappointed because the government did not make good on its promises as quickly as the opposition wanted. The government was hesitant to set a date for the elections. Then it said that elections would take place in October, 19 months after the liberation of Kuwait. The opposition thought that this was too long of a time. There was a dire need for the opposition to get back into the political arena and participate actively with the government in making the important political decisions, especially those related to security and strategic and military arrangements, rebuilding the country, economic conditions, and dealing with the wrongdoers. The government decided to proceed calmly because it did not want the Kuwaiti front to disintegrate after being united in the wake of the Iraqi invasion, occupation, and destruction, which led to the unification of all Kuwaitis, regardless of sects and social composition, to confront the common enemy, represented by Saddam Husayn's Iraq.

According to the opposition, the first setback was delaying the elections until October 1992. The second setback was the formation of the Cabinet and the restoration of most of the ministers to their previous posts. The opposition interpreted this action to mean that the government did not care for the opposition. This view was expressed in a statement issued by the opposition on 21 April 1991, in which it mentioned, as it did in a 31 March 1991 statement titled "A Futuristic Vision To Rebuild Kuwait," the demands of the seven opposition blocs after unification.

- Halting the violations of the Constitution, putting an end to suspending articles of the Constitution, and restoring political and press freedoms.
- Setting a date for parliamentary elections.
- Establishing a popular cabinet in which all of the political powers are represented in response to the requirements of the present era.
- Holding those responsible for the disaster accountable and not allowing them to relinquish their social responsibilities that resulted from their actions before and after the disaster faced by the nation.

The opposition did not succeed in persuading the government with these demands. Its optimism and demands became disappointments. The major portfolios in the Cabinet were distributed according to the well-established inheritance rules. The opposition accused the government of disregarding Article 56 of the Constitution, which was included in the explanatory notes regarding the importance of consultations before forming a cabinet. The opposition accused the government of confusing the situation and acting haphazardly, ignoring the demands of the Kuwaiti people, monopolizing the Cabinet, and rewarding the negligent. The new Cabinet was interpreted as a flagrant challenge to the people aimed at isolation and replacing them with an individual will.

The third setback was the government's rejection of the opposition by calling for the return of the National Council. This represented the last setback for the opposition, which was hoping for the council to be dissolved and for some of the traditional opposition elements to hold Cabinet positions in a new national government that would participate in making decisions.

The fourth setback was the refusal of the Ministry of the Interior in May 1992 to allow the opposition to organize a national conference to discuss important issues and to comment on the latest political, economic, and security issues related to the elections.

The Kuwaiti opposition united its forces and arrived with new names, but without new ideas. For the first time, the Kuwaiti opposition came under one umbrella, with seven alliances that could best be described as "new faces with old ideas." The following is a description of each of these seven alliances. [passage omitted]

National Islamic Coalition

The National Islamic Coalition is one of the most important of the seven blocs. It is a coalition of three movements that have similar thoughts, goals, and objectives. The coalition consists of the following movements:

- The Cultural Society, which was dissolved by the Ministry of Social Affairs. It is a movement that nominated candidates for the 1981 and 1985 Assemblies. It is the only part of the coalition that has parliamentary experience.
- Al-Naqi Mosque Youth. This is a group of young, enthusiastic men who seek reform and balance in Kuwaiti society.
- Independent political members, including technocrats and liberal intelligentsia. [passage omitted]

It is expected that about 75 to 100 candidates, about 30 percent of the total number of candidates, will support the coalition. The total number of coalition supporters in the 25 districts is about 20,000 voters. In 1985, the coalition had three members in the Assembly, which was the smallest number for this coalition in the history of Kuwaiti parliamentary life.

Popular Islamic Grouping

The most important principle of this grouping is adherence to the Koran and the Sunna and enforcement of the Islamic shari'a. This coalition is known in Kuwait as the Salafi Grouping.

The grouping came into existence during the 1981 elections. It won two seats in both the 1981 and 1985 Assemblies. In the 1985 elections, their strongest candidate, Jasim al-'Awn, won in Kifan, and 'Ahmad Baqir won in al-Qadisiyah and al-Mansuriyah. [passage omitted]

Islamic Constitutional Movement

This is a reform society known for its flexible positions, adopting reform from within and cooperating with the government to realize it. In the 1981 and 1985 Assemblies, it won three seats. [passage omitted] The movement is suffering from a identity crisis. The positions of the international Muslim Brotherhood and its support of Iraq have had a very negative effect during the elections. This is in addition to the fact that most of the prominent figures of the movement were not in Kuwait during the Iraqi occupation.

This movement could win the same number of seats it had in the previous Assembly (two seats), but it needs to coordinate and explain its positions and enter into a coalition with other blocs. Yet, it does not seem that the Salafi Movement and the Muslim Brotherhood will be able to coordinate because of unresolved disagreements.

Constitutional Grouping

Historically, this grouping has cooperated with the government. Its goals are moderate and clear and depend on political and economic reform. It is currently criticizing the government because it does not pay enough attention to reviving the devastated private sector. The Kuwaiti private sector is made up of Kuwaiti merchants who own businesses, real estate, and large companies. It also includes some of Kuwait's biggest families. They are represented in the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry, which is presided over by 'Abd-al-'Aziz Hamad al-Saqr. Since its inception, this grouping has had a strong presence in the Assembly, even if the number of seats differed. [passage omitted]

The results of the election of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in 1992 had clear political effects. The Constitutional Grouping, under the leadership of 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-Saqr won 22 of the 24 seats on the council. This reflects the strength of the grouping and its opposition to the government, which is being accused of not concentrating on a private sector that is currently facing problems and that plays a marginal role in reconstructing Kuwait.

The overwhelming victory in the Chamber of Commerce and Industry elections should not lead us to assume that it will have the same success in the parliamentary elections in October. This is due to differences in the nature, voters, and quality of both elections.

Independents

This is a coalition that does not have clear features and is known for its liberal trend, which is concerned about the development of the Kuwaiti parliamentary experience. Most of its members are intellectuals, academic figures, and lawyers. They are strongly supported by the Democratic Forum. The platform of the Independent deputies does not include strong support for Arab unity and national ideas.

Kuwaiti Democratic Forum

This is the only coalition in the Kuwaiti political arena that has all the characteristics of a clear political party without opposition from the government. It is a very important development for the future Kuwaiti legislation on political parties. The Democratic Forum may have paved the way for the future establishment of political parties in Kuwait. It is a mixture of the National Coalition (Jasim al-Qitami group) and the Democratic Coalition ('Ahmad al-Khatib group). It is also a mixture of the progressives and the nationals, who supplied the traditional opposition in Kuwait when the parliament was established. They also played important roles in the parliaments during the 1960's, 1970's, and 1980's. They have very clear views about political development, supervision of the government, foreign relations, and economic and investment issues. The groups that make up this forum have had at least seven members in most of the previous legislatures.

The forum suffers from tense disagreements due to differences in opinion and trends within its ranks. There is a strong argument between two trends. One trend wants to work with the government, and the other wants to attack it and take an offensive attitude, especially with regard to government accountability and the opening of the "2 August" files. This is one of the major problems of the forum.

The second problem is that there is no new blood in the forum. The well-known figures are those that have been there since the 1950's and 1960's, such as Dr. 'Ahmad al-Khatib, Jasim al-Qitami, and 'Abdallah al-Nibari. There is no new leadership.

The third problem is connected with some statements made by prominent figures during the occupation and its stance on the war with Iraq. These statements may have had a negative effect on the forum and may affect the chances of some of its members in the coming elections. [passage omitted]

Al-Nibari stressed that the forum would support candidates in other districts, provided that their platforms include restoring the 1962 Constitution and working toward establishing democracy and the supremacy of law. [passage omitted]

Bloc of Independent Deputies

This is a coalition of former members of the 1985 Assembly. The bloc has about 20 members with previous parliamentary experience who are seeking reelection. The most prominent figures in this group are 'Ahmad al-Sa'dun, former Assembly speaker; his deputy, Salih al-Fidalah; Sa'd al-Tami; 'Ahmad al-Sharhan; and Faysal al-Sani'. [passage omitted]
