Summary

During the past five years, we have continued our work to understand and elucidate the microstructure of geopolymers and geopolymer composites, as fabricated and upon conversion to ceramics with heating. The microstructure consisted of nanoporous, nanoparticulate precipitates, and contains ~40% nanoporosity of average diameter 6.8 nm in the case of K-based geopolymer. The size of the precipitates increase with increasing ionic radius of the charge balancing cation, having diameters of the order of 5-10 nm for Na^+ , 10-20 nm for K^+ and 30-40 nm for Cs^+ . The room temperature compressive strengths were systematically investigated as a function of Group I charge balancing cations (Na, K, and Cs and mixtures of Na-K). Potential applications were explored in the area of refractory adhesives between metal, corrosion resistant coatings on steel, glass and ceramics, porous membranes and foams, ceramic armor composites, iron-based geopolymer analogues, geopolymer composites reinforced with chopped polypropylene or basalt fibers, and polycrystalline ceramics or glass-ceramics. The basic science of amorphous geopolymer structure was probed down to the Angstrom level by state of the art Pair Distribution Function analysis (PDF) of X-ray synchrotron data. It revealed that the building blocks of AlO_4^- and SiO_4 units were formed from solution under ambient conditions, consistent with the hypothesis that geopolymerization occurs by the three steps of dissolution, polycondensation and precipitation. Stoichiometric composites corresponding to $\text{M}_2\text{O} \cdot \text{Al}_2\text{O}_3 \cdot 4\text{SiO}_2 \cdot 11\text{H}_2\text{O}$ where M = Na, K, or Cs, were heated to form polycrystalline ceramics. The conversions were studied by a range of ceramic powder characterization and processing techniques including XRD, synchrotron, SEM, EDS, TEM, density measurements by the Archimedes method, pycnometry, specific surface area analysis (SSA), mercury intrusion porosimetry (MIP) and flexure strength measurements. As a result of this research we now have a much improved insight into the nature and properties of aluminosilicate geopolymers. We are now poised to continue this work into the area of evolution of high temperature microstructure and mechanical properties.
